Nisel Troops Use 'Mouse Trap' Play to Annihilate Germans

Second Battalion
Of 442nd Captures
67 Nazis

ITALY—The old "mouse trap" play which has been used by the United States Army to annihilate a counterattacking German infantry unit has been successfully used by the 442nd Infantry here in recent days of the Allied offensive which captured the German surrendered of all German forces in Italy.

The 2nd Battalion of the 442nd Infantry, which was under the command of Major General William P. Draper of Illinois, and with the close support of Field Marshal Heinrich von Vietinghoff, the German army commander, killed or wounded 500 enemy personnel and captured 1,000 German prisoners in an advance of only a little over an hour on an early morning fighting front.

After capturing of the German town of Casalboro in the south of Italy, the soldiers of the 442nd were able to establish contact with the American forces on the surrounding hills. The Jerries, thinking that only a single force was left to hold the town, interpreted to the outskirts under the guard of a heavy artillery barrage. A flanking force forced the town to the right of the town, where the main enemy body could get away.

By radio block orders appeared to 4,000 Jerries. Major General Jerome directed the Jerries to move to a position near the upper part of the town and to advance into the town, and to position themselves on the north and south sides of the hills on both sides of the town.

Meanwhile, in the town, battle alternately attacked the town from all sides.

A ruse to keep the Jerries off their feet was used in the town of Casalboro, and there was no ability to be on the streets of the Jerries.

The Jerries, with 500 killed and 1,000 wounded, are ordered to be destroyed by the American forces.

In the decade of imperialistic aggression, which preceded World War II, it was a challenge to many nations to resist the pressure of US imperialism. Harbor the Japanese fascists ruthlessly crushed the vestiges of political and economic independence, Japanese industry and trade, smashed the growing trade unions and socialist parties, and crushed the leaders of anti-militarist activity. Like the Nazis in Europe, they also attempted to further their ambition through the creation of the Japanese fascist empire, which they considered a threat to the peace of the world.

The Japanese fascists did their work well, for they were not only in control of the secret police forces of the country, but they also aimed to deceive the Allied forces of the nation. Japanese leaders, who were in control of the concentration camps, the economy, and the political system, were the victors.

The JACL, as the organization of the conflict, was a major force in the struggle for freedom. They were the leaders of the movement, and they were the ones who fought for the right to have a voice in the decisions that affected their lives.

WRA in 1946

The admirable program of the War Relocation Authority (WRA), which was designed to remove and rehouse the Japanese American population, was a significant step forward in the process of civic education and social responsibility. The WRA was formed in 1941 as a result of the evacuation order issued by the Japanese government.

The Japanese government had not only removed its citizens from the United States, but it had also forced them to leave their homes and belongings. This was a significant loss for the Japanese American community, as it had an impact on their way of life and their ability to participate in the economy.

The Japanese Americans who were removed from their homes and businesses were forced to relocate to internment camps. These camps were located in remote areas of the country, and they were designed to house the Japanese American population until it was determined whether they were loyal to the United States. The camps were divided into labor and civilian units, and they were designed to provide a controlled environment for the Japanese Americans.

The JACL, as the organization of the conflict, was a significant voice in the fight for freedom. They were the leaders of the movement, and they were the ones who fought for the right to have a voice in the decisions that affected their lives.

The Japanese American community was divided in its views on the WRA. Some were opposed to the program, while others were in favor of it. However, the majority of the Japanese Americans were happy to see the end of the internment camps.

Ancestry of Courage for the Nisei

The peasant boy, not yet old enough to be of school age, was courted by the soldiers not because they liked his looks, but because they wanted his family. The war was not yet over, but the enemy had already begun to prepare for the next one. The Japanese government, through its military, had started recruiting Nisei (second generation Japanese Americans) to serve in the war effort. The government was offering incentives to the Nisei to join the military, promising them a way out of the uncertainties of life in a country where their parents were often discriminated against.

The story of Frank Hachiya, a young man from the San Francisco area, is a testament to the courage and sacrifice of the Nisei generation. Frank, like many others, was drafted into the military during the war. He was sent to Japan to serve in the war effort, and his family was left behind. Despite the challenges and hardships, Frank never forgot the sacrifices of his ancestors and the importance of their heritage.

The legacy of the Nisei generation is one of courage, resilience, and sacrifice. They are an inspiration to all who understand the importance of what they did and the sacrifices they made.

Saga of a Nisei Hero:

Frank Hachiya of Hood River

Fought and Died for Democracy

The story of Frank Hachiya, a Japanese American war hero, is one that is often overlooked in the history of the Pacific Northwest. Born and raised in Hood River, Oregon, Frank was one of the many Nisei who were drafted into the military during World War II. After being stationed in Japan, Frank was sent on a mission to deliver a message to the Japanese government. He was killed in action, sacrificing his life for democracy.

Frank Hachiya was born in Hood River, Oregon, in 1923, where he lived until he was drafted into the military as part of the 442nd Regimental Combat Team. The 442nd was made up of Japanese Americans who were fighting on the side of the United States.

Frank Hachiya's story is one of bravery and sacrifice. He was one of many Nisei who fought for the ideals of democracy and freedom.

In recognition of his heroism, the United States government awarded Frank Hachiya the Medal of Honor, the highest military honor that can be given to an American soldier.

The legacy of Frank Hachiya lives on in the memories of his family and friends and in the stories of the many other Nisei who fought and died for democracy.

WASHINGTON—The welcome accorded the loyal Nisei by the CIO unions throughout the country since the outbreak of the wave of terror caused by hoodlums on the West Coast is evidenced by the principal publication of the CIO’s CIO News, a weekly, in a double-page spread on May 25 describing the American and loyal citizens of Japanese ancestry in the West Coast’s post-production effort.

In an editorial, the paper said that CIO unions “have aided the Japanese by giving jobs and in turning up the thread of community effort.”

The article by Fred Ross cited several examples of the anti-Japanese discrimination in the case of the defense workers who looked the management of the great defense plants in their threat to fire 14 men who had joined the American, the Journal of the University of Minnesota’s Tatsumi Yabe.

In other areas, the Union News noted the return to work of: the workers in the steel industry, the textile industry, the shipbuilding industry, and other industries.

The CIO News also cited other examples of the loyal and patriotic response of Japanese ancestry to Oregon’s call for a CIO-Builders Union to work on the Columbia River project.
